Jan 25, 2020 The Medieval and Renaissance treasure map 15th to 17th Century The advent of cartography and seafaring ushered in the Renaissance and the Golden Age of exploration. The exploration opened up the world, exposing rich trade opportunities and new riches from previously unknown lands. These riches needed to be mapped to enable trade to go where the treasure was. Thus the map became a tool to map out new lands and identify new trade routes, possibly even on military orders from kings or nobles. Often the maps were filled with mythical creatures, dragons, unicorns and exotically dressed ladies. Since these 'family maps' were rarely used for trade, they became popular for their decorative and artistic qualities. Such maps would reflect the heraldry, coats of arms, and family crests of the subjects. King Erik of Denmark used this as a reason to draw a map of the countries he was supposed to invade. His children got to add a map of their own. These maps were often so spectacularly artistic that they could be called "art for art's sake". However, the maps did not always reflect the mapmaker's artistic skills, as many great maps were created by "map-makers" with a less than ideal sense of perspective. The most famous treasure map of the time may be the Tresor des Bergiers, or the Treasure of the Knights Templar. An anonymous map from 3da54e8ca3
