Post Processing When a photograph is exposed and developed and then printed, the colors will not be exactly the same as the colors you saw before developing. By printing the photographs, a few things happen: * The paper will absorb the dyes in the photograph. The color shifts will occur. * Scaling and resizing the picture will also affect the color. All of these effects can be corrected and improved in the development stage. Printing a photograph allows some of the differences in color to take place while the image is viewed on a screen. When viewing a digital photograph, the colors will have changed. The correction of color shift is a common adjustment step in any digital photograph and is called "color balancing." Before printing the photograph, or, as it turns out, before using a printer to print the photograph, the photograph is opened in Photoshop and color balancing is performed. Color balancing is generally done for a photograph of a single subject that is taken at one moment in time. It can be a difficult task when a person is standing in one spot for a long time, and the color shifts can be substantial. However, if an object or subject is not in one position for a long time, the color balancing can be performed fairly easily. A color balancing process involves opening a file in Photoshop and using the Adjustments palette to lower and raise the blue, green, red, and other color values in the image. When the color values are lowered, a blue shift occurs because of the paper used. When the color values are raised, a yellow shift occurs, because the paper has soaked up the color. You will likely notice quite a difference with the mouse cursor, too, because when color values are lifted, the mouse cursor will not move as it would normally do. The most common way to perform color balancing is to open the file in Photoshop. Because the goal is to make the colors and the color shifts more even, the first step is to reduce the color shift as best as possible. To reduce

Q: Can't install Pycharm through terminal I'm trying to install Pycharm through the command line. I downloaded and ran the dmg package and for some reason the installer keeps saying that it's finished but the command line returns, "Ignoring this package as it does not appear to be signed with an authority that the system recognizes." I was able to install the other packages via terminal so I'm assuming this is an issue with the Pycharm package. A: If you want to install PyCharm via the terminal, you need to open the.dmg file with Apple's disk utility first. Make sure that the file downloaded has good sha1 checksums before proceeding to install. If you are not familiar with the Terminal, you can find the packages' sha1 values here. Then, in the Terminal, type sudo installer -pkg /your/path/to/pycharm_4.0.1_mac64.dmg -target / Replace the "path to" with the path to the downloaded dmg file. You can install PyCharm using the GUI, if you prefer. The GUI might be easier than the Terminal as you will not need to open the.dmg file. You can find the link here. A newborn baby emits about 40 grams of carbon dioxide per day. A wood stove emits about the same amount of carbon dioxide per day. A wind turbine generates carbon dioxide. Renewable energy generation is the way of the future. Given current technology it is not a question of if, but when. Renewable energy requires no input of fossil fuels. Here is the problem: Renewable energy can be produced without carbon emissions. We don't want to do that. It is not a question of if, but when. So, what do we do? How can we deal with the problem? Some people say that all renewable energy is a good thing for the environment. They say that renewable energy should replace fossil fuels. Others say that there are too
