The petition is a long shot. Washington was one of the first to begin reopening state economies, and the state's Department of Health says it doesn't have plans to reopen marijuana shops. But for people like, Hope Edmonds, a leader of the initiative's advisory council, it's a step in the right direction. "Marijuana is medicine," she said. "It's the safest medicine we have. It's the only medicine that helps people who are in their chronic pain and in their mental health." Edmonds is launching the petition in conjunction with I-502, the initiative that legalized marijuana in Washington in 2012. She says it's been a struggle to ensure that the people who need marijuana are getting it. "We're not completely satisfied, and we want to make sure that we get a higher percentage of those who are looking for the medicine that is allowed to have the medicine that they need." Edmonds says that more than one-third of the state's patients — and perhaps as many as half the people who need medical marijuana — are unable to access it. Under state law, people with intractable pain or cancer must get their marijuana from a licensed dispensary. But as of now, a crisis with a shortage of medical marijuana is unfolding. "It's really, really serious," Edmonds said. "The truth is, people who are really suffering are going to have to choose between eating and getting their medicine." Under the state's guidelines, patients are allowed to grow their own cannabis at home, but the law requires
