In this study, two continuous stirred tank reactors (CTRs) (ST-24 and ST-28) were operated for 50 days using grass/molasses/straw as anaerobic substrate. In ST-24, the content of dry matter in the feed mixture was 9.7 g/L and its initial total volatile fatty acids (VFAs) content was 2.3 g/L. The average VFA content at the end of the experiment was 4.5 g/L. In ST-28, the content of dry matter in the feed mixture was 11.4 g/L and its initial total VFAs content was 4.7 g/L. The average VFA content at the end of the experiment was 4.5 g/L. The biogas yield per kg of dry matter in ST-24 was comparable to that of other studies. The VFA content in the effluent of the reactors was over 3.5 g/L at the end of the experiment. These findings support the idea of increasing the VFA content to facilitate the use of the final effluent for energy purposes. Aminoacyl-tRNA synthetases catalyze the covalent attachment of an amino acid to its cognate tRNA. In this process the attachment of the amino acid is contingent upon the presence of an activated amino acid. For example, the amino acid attachment to a cognate tRNA requires an amino acid with an alpha-amino group, which is activated by the alpha-amino group of the tRNA. Most of the amino acids which can be attached to tRNA have side chains which are highly reactive, and a terminal alpha-amino group. The only exceptions are glycine and serine. Glycine can form an amide bond with either of the two 2-carbon units of tRNA. The amide bond is formed by the alpha-amino group of the glycine side chain and an ester carbon of the tRNA. However
