The truth is, there are infinite variables in computer design. It isn't all grey-colored bearing blocks, metal, and plastic, contrary to what Apple might proclaim. The building's architects, Zachary Breisacher (Z-B) and Thomas Breisacher (T-B), feature flying automated building panels for the facade, which were fabricated via 3D printing. The panels can be arranged in 37 unique configurations to blend together seamlessly and form the building's illusions. The 3D-printed facade was inspired by the graphic of the flying squid, or Aricida, and constructed with concrete that could be stained using the porous material—essentially creating a concrete facade that can be made to change color on a daily basis. The panels can be lit from within and take on different colors throughout the day and night. "From the time we started conceptualizing the site drawings, we knew the way this facade would eventually be installed was going to be new and different," says T-B. "We were excited about being a part of a new process. Our goal was the construction process. When we first began to work with the structural engineer, we were able to understand what [the crane] was going to do." The panels were fabricated by Composite 3D. The building's structural engineer used a 3D laser scanner and measured the panels to ensure they fit together correctly before installation. Once the panels were completed, they were laser-etched with graphics, and then 3D-printed using the concrete material. A 3D-printed guide was used to help install the panels at the panel's shop to ensure they fit together correctly.
